What a great book on Colombia. Colombia is one of the world's most exciting emerging markets. A nation full of young, ambitious people, this South American country is ripe for development in a number of key areas, such as information technology, health care, medical tourism, business, education, and more. In fact, Colombia is the perfect testing ground for developing other emerging markets in South America. Here are some of the things that make Colombia special among South American nations, the reasons for its vast potential in important areas of the market, and what development in these areas will mean for Colombia and the world.

Emerging Markets in Colombia: An Overview

There are a number of promising emerging markets in Colombia. These markets are perfectly poised to move from emerging to fully developed. All it will take is a little bit of foreign investment and a firm commitment from the Colombian government and people to make these markets blossom on the world stage. Some key areas to watch in this nation include:

Information Technology--Colombia is one of the few Latin American countries that is really poised to take off in the IT field. Information technology is still a pretty new thing there, but that's the case for all of its neighboring countries, too. However, Colombia is pulling ahead of the pack due to privatization and deregulation efforts by the government. In fact, government policies toward IT are among the most liberal in South America, which is allowing the nation to modernize more quickly than its neighbors. It is in an excellent position to become the IT leader of the region. One of the big advantages Colombia has in the information technology market is its geographic location. It has borders on both the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, which makes it easily able to serve markets in both areas. Some strategic IT markets that are perfect for Colombia to explore include the Caribbean, Central America, some of the NAFTA countries, the Pacific Rim, and Europe. The market is wide open for Colombia to develop strategic partnerships in these areas that will improve the nation's overall economy and jobs market. In fact, Colombia would make a perfect location for call centers for major corporations that do business in a variety of countries. While outsourcing to India is all the rage right now, due to its low wages and highly developed IT infrastructure, Colombia may become the more desired location soon. As it develops its fledgling IT infrastructure, more foreign companies will be looking at the advantages of setting up call centers there, as Colombia has a very educated young population that is eager to work. Call centers can take care of international business needs while providing young Colombian nationals with the entry level positions they crave, and that will set them on paths to corporate careers with good pay, benefits, and prestige that were not available to their parents.
